Today, I went to the studio with a strange heaviness inside me. The air was silent, but my mind was noisy. It doesn't feel like something is going to happen... it feels like something already has. Like I've woken up in the middle of something that started a long time ago.

Beril.

Today, she looked at me in a way that said everything without a single word. It wasn't a look I recognized. I've had many eyes on me before—pleading, broken, angry. But this... this was different. As if she already knows the whole story, and now she's just waiting to see how I'll play it out.

Someone might've heard what I said about her. Or maybe she just picked up on everything she needed to. You don't need names when the story is familiar. Especially when it's yours.

What I once said was "for her own good" now feels like it's being turned into a weapon against me. But it's not even her I'm afraid of. It's the echo of my own words. They're coming back. There's something in the tone. The way I said those things—laughing, casual—it's that voice she hears now. Not the meaning, the intent beneath it.

Did I hurt her?

Not directly, maybe. But the indirect things are always the ones that leave marks. She opened up, she trusted me, and I listened. Then I molded her into something else—something that would make for a good segment. Dressed it up, turned it into a "story." No names, no labels. But anyone listening knew. Especially her.

I did a short broadcast today. My voice sounded normal. The words were in place. But as I spoke, I felt like someone was taking notes. Were they really there, or just in my head? I couldn't tell. But they were writing. Word for word.

My hand shook when I turned off the mic. I can't get Beril's eyes out of my head. She's not just looking anymore. She's waiting.

And for the first time, I feel like words won't be enough to protect me.
