

[Recording begins – 00:00]

Onur (slow, deliberate tone):
There's a man I used to see every week.
Same corner of the café.
Same order. Same shirt, even.

But he didn't belong there.
Not really.

[00:17]
He was watching someone.
At first, I thought it was admiration.
Then curiosity.
Then something stranger.

Because one day, he walked in with the same coat.
Next week – same watch.
A week later – the same laugh.
But it wasn't his laugh.
Not really.

[00:36]
It was like he was studying a role.
But not to perform it.
To become it.

[00:45]
I watched him slowly erase his own edges.
No more unique expressions.
No spontaneous thoughts.
Only echoes.

He sat like him.
Talked like him.
Smiled like him.
Until there was no difference.

[01:01]
And then... the original stopped coming.

[01:06]
No one noticed.
Because his space was still filled.
Same jokes. Same nods.
Same man –
just... not really.

[01:18]
And the copy?
He never blinked.

[01:22]

Some people steal identity with documents.
Others do it with patience.
And silence.

[01:30]

I never asked why.
Because maybe I didn't want to hear my own answer.

[Recording ends – 01:36]