

She started dressing differently.
Subtle, but noticeable. A darker coat. Hair tighter. Eyes flatter.
People change when they're trying not to be seen. Or when they want to be seen differently.

I think she's trying to reclaim something.
Maybe space. Maybe dignity.
But she keeps sitting in the same chair, in the same room, across from the same silence.

She doesn't ask questions anymore.
She just waits for me to speak.
And when I do, she absorbs it like she owes me something.

She thinks she's resisting.
But her rebellion is made of paper.
It crumbles as soon as I stop looking.

She's not afraid of me.
She's afraid of being wrong about me.

And that's much easier to work with.