Everything felt ordinary today. I woke up a few minutes before the alarm—seems like my body has memorized the time lately. While brewing coffee, an old Ella Fitzgerald tune came on the radio. That was the first pleasant surprise of the day.

I got to the studio early. There was a slight glitch in the mixer panel, but it was manageable. Cihan showed up late again. I didn't say anything this time. His delays have become part of the routine around here. Everyone disrupts the flow in their own way.

I was alone on air. No specific topic today—just talked about “sound.” Noise, silence, pauses... Listener numbers weren't bad. Someone messaged afterward, “Talk more about silence.” It made me smile.

After the broadcast, I did some paperwork. Updated the weekly frequency logs, checked a couple of devices. These small tasks help. Holding something in your hands, touching something real... doing something beyond a screen—it grounds me.

In the afternoon, I stopped by Murat's café. As usual, we didn't talk much. But the coffee was solid. Sometimes a few quiet minutes are all it takes to reset your head.

Nothing much else to write about today. And maybe that's a good thing. My mind is like a flat line tonight. No highs, no lows.
