Last night, I dreamed about our old house. What's strange is that even though I haven't been there in years, I still remembered the crack on the kitchen wall. Even the picture frame that leaned slightly to the left was exactly where it used to be. I didn't think too much about its meaning when I woke up. But some things stay with you even after you open your eyes.

I started the broadcast a bit late today. Not because of a technical issue—I just wanted to stall. I opened with nature sounds, wind rustling through trees... then moved into a classical piece. No topic today either. I just wandered through words.

Beril messaged during the show. She wrote something that probably would've made me smile, but I didn't. Maybe it was the timing. Or maybe words sometimes collide with time.

After the broadcast, I stayed alone in the studio. There was an old notebook on the desk—no idea who it belongs to. When I opened it, most pages were blank, except one with a small symbol drawn in the corner—a circle with a cross through it. I don't know if it was familiar or not, but it irritated me. For no reason.

I wasn't going to write tonight, but I did. Sometimes not writing leaves a deeper mark than writing ever could.

That's all for today.
