Still no sign of Beril today. But I feel like I'm standing on the edge of something. Silence isn't just absence anymore—it's accumulation. Like a wave that's been growing quietly.

After the broadcast, I sat alone in the studio. While flipping through some old folders, I came across one labeled: "Technical Requests_2024." Notes and detailed reports Beril had prepared about the system... and my own handwritten comments in the margins. Some sarcastic, some dismissive. Back then, I told myself it was just to "improve clarity." Looking at it now... it feels more like belittling.

And that was just the written stuff. The spoken things were worse. Sentences that began with "You probably didn't think of this..." Half-finished suggestions. Taking her ideas and presenting them like they were mine. All of it wrapped in the tone of friendly concern. Maybe I even believed it myself. Or convinced myself I did.

She once told me, "You take ownership of everything too quickly." I laughed. But now that line won't leave my head. Maybe I didn't take ownership. Maybe I just wanted control. Over Beril, her ideas—even her silence.

One thing I've learned over the years: some people don't need to be physically present to weigh on you. Like my father, for instance. And maybe... without realizing it, I stepped into that role. The one who doesn't give orders, but makes you feel them anyway.

Maybe that's why she won't look at me now. Maybe that's why she walked past the studio today but didn't come in.

Some things pile up. Some people don't stay silent. And me... I might just be the last sentence in someone's silence.
