Today, I did everything as if it were “normal.” The alarm rang—I got up. Brewed my coffee, opened my notebook, prepped for the broadcast. But inside, it felt like a sit-in. I moved, but I didn’t move forward.

I returned to the old classics on air. Miles Davis. A safe sound. A tone that says so much without saying anything. Sometimes speaking without words is more effective.

Cihan didn’t show up. Murat didn’t text. I didn’t reach out to Beril. No one asked me anything all day. I thought that was comforting. But now that I think about it... maybe not being heard is scarier than anything I might have to say.

Everything in the studio worked as it should. The system ran smoothly. Mic levels were steady. No static. But the fact that everything was functioning so perfectly felt off. Silence shouldn’t be this well-behaved.

I stepped outside for a bit today. Walked down a street I hadn’t visited in ages. Nothing had changed. Same corner shop, same stray cat, same cracked piece of pavement. Everything in its place—but I felt out of place in it.

I thought about Beril. Like everyone whose eyes I can’t meet, her gaze has become clearer in my mind. She sits inside me like an unfinished paragraph. Like a sentence with the comma in the wrong place.

I told myself, “It’s time to pull it all together.” But the voice that said it felt like someone else’s. Not mine.
