There was an envelope in my mailbox today. No address, no stamp. Just a blank sheet of paper inside. A joke? Or is someone trying to say something? I don't really care. Some silences aren't empty—but some are just emptiness. This was the second kind.

I thought about Selin. A memory from years ago surfaced like a flash—what she said isn't what stuck with me, it's how she said it. Her voice trembling, eyes darting away. She was trying to tell me something. I don't remember what it was now. Not because I want to forget—because I didn't care enough to remember.

It was always like that with her. Selin's too emotional, too inward. The kind who thinks ten times before taking a single step. Not exactly weak, but definitely indecisive. That night, she didn't push me to act. And she still wouldn't. She's never been one of those people who do anything. No matter what kind of storm is raging inside, her surface always stays calm. That's why I'm not worried.

Did I hurt her? Maybe. But that's part of life. Everyone's got a scar or two. If hers came from me, that's her fragility. Not mine.

Not like Beril.

Beril's silence feels like a threat.

Selin's silence is just... quiet.

There's a show tomorrow. Maybe I'll start with my own voice. Maybe someone else's words.

Does it matter?
