

I had my coffee at Murat's café today. Busier than usual. I ran into someone familiar—can't recall the name, but the face belonged to a different time. He talked. I nodded. But I wasn't really there. My eyes kept scanning the room. Not for danger—just... movement.

Then, something caught the corner of my eye. A table near the window. Two women.
One had a long black coat – unmistakable silhouette.
The other leaned in slightly, her head tilted as if explaining something.

For a moment, I couldn't breathe.

Was it Beril?

And next to her... Selin?

Beril and Selin. Sitting together.

That shouldn't make sense. Not even as a coincidence. They don't share spaces. They don't orbit the same conversations. So what was this?

I shifted for a better angle, but Murat walked right into the line of sight. By the time he passed, the table was empty. Just two untouched glasses and an afterimage.

Maybe I imagined it.
Maybe it was someone else.
Maybe I saw what I feared—not what was there.

But if it was them—
If they really met, really talked...

Then I'm not dealing with fragments anymore.
Then the silences weren't random.
Then Beril's stillness wasn't caution—it was calculation.

And Selin... I've always underestimated her.
Because she moves slow. Because she hesitates.
But maybe that wasn't fear. Maybe that was restraint.

I didn't go on air today. I wasn't ready.
My head wasn't in the broadcast.
It was stuck at that window table.
Staring into what was no longer there.

Beril doesn't ask questions anymore.
And that scares me more than anything she could say.