

[Recording begins – 00:00]

Onur (flat, focused tone):
Some people don't enter a room.
They occupy it.
Not loudly – not with words or presence.
But with... predictability.

He always sat in the fourth row.
Middle seat. Same coat. Same cup of tea.
You wouldn't notice him unless he wasn't there.

[00:20]
He never asked questions.
Never stayed behind after a session.
Just listened. Nodded. Sometimes smiled.
But never enough to remember the smile.

[00:33]
Then one day...
He spoke.
Just a single sentence.
It wasn't profound. It wasn't even clear.
But it was enough to break the rhythm of the room.

[00:45]
After that, people looked at him differently.
As if he'd always been saying something.
And now they were ashamed they hadn't heard it sooner.

[00:58]
But the strange thing is...
He didn't come back after that.
Fourth row stayed empty.
The seat never warmed up again.

[01:10]
Some people leave only once.
But their absence keeps walking in,
week after week.

[01:18]
We never knew his name.
But we all knew his space.

[Recording ends – 01:26]