

[Recording begins – 00:00]

Onur (soft, almost distant):
She was always in the background.
Not forgotten –
just never quite remembered.

She didn't speak loudly.
She didn't argue.
She didn't leave.
She just stayed.

[00:20]
At the edge of conversations,
in the corners of group photos,
her face was always slightly blurred.
Not because the lens failed –
but because no one focused.

[00:35]
She learned names quickly.
Stories faster.
Favorite colors, preferred coffee orders, allergies.
Not hers –
other people's.

[00:47]
She memorized lives like verses.
Not to use them.
Just to feel surrounded.

[00:54]
One day, someone asked her what she wanted.
She smiled.
Paused.
And told a story that wasn't hers.
A beautiful one.
Detailed.
Flawless.

[01:07]
They believed her.
And for the first time, she felt seen.

[01:12]
She spent the next year collecting more stories.
Layer by layer, stitching herself together out of other people's pasts.

[01:21]
And when she walked into a room,
no one noticed she was made of borrowed light.

[01:28]

She wasn't empty.
She was echo.

[01:33]
And echoes are still heard – even if no one's sure where they came from.

[Recording ends – 01:41]