

[Recording begins – 00:00]

Onur (quiet, introspective):
Some silences don't come from fear.
Some come from habit.

There are people who never raise their voice,
not because they're calm...
but because they learned early that speaking didn't change anything.

[00:18]
I once knew someone like that.
She carried her whole life in half-sentences.
You had to watch her closely to understand her.
Not what she said – but what she skipped.

[00:33]
When she was a child, something shifted inside her.
A room. A voice. A presence that shouldn't have been there.
She never told anyone.
Not in the way people expect.
Not with words.

[00:48]
But her posture said it.
The way she folded in on herself when someone got too close.
The way her eyes would scan a room in two seconds flat.
The way she'd flinch...
not when someone touched her,
but when someone looked at her for a second too long.

[01:08]
People called her quiet.
Polite.
"So thoughtful," they said.
But none of them noticed the silence wasn't empty.
It was full – overflowing, even.

[01:20]
She never wanted to be seen.
Until one day, she did.
And that's the day she broke.

[01:30]
I think some people wait their whole lives for someone to ask the right question.
And when it never comes...
they start answering anyway.
Quietly. Indirectly. In code.

[01:44]
And if you listen closely – really closely – sometimes you'll realize:
They were never hiding.

You just weren't looking.

[Recording ends – 01:58]