

She waved at me today - from across the hallway.

Like we were friends.

I nodded.

That was enough for her.

That's always enough for her.

The bar is so low she can step over it in her sleep.

Sometimes I think she builds connections the way kids draw stick figures:

Two dots for eyes. A smile. Done.

I envy her ability to mistake recognition for affection.

It must be nice, living in a world where people mean what they say - and say what they mean.

Even when they don't.
