I went to the studio early today. The building was empty. The lights were off, but somehow it wasn't dark inside. Sometimes darkness isn't the absence of light. It's something else entirely.

The studio used to feel like it belonged to me. Now, it's as if it's shutting me out. Everything is in its place, yet nothing feels right. Same doors, same cables, same sound panels... but something's off. A sense of unfamiliarity I can't quite explain.

I turned on the microphone but didn't speak. I just sat there. The clock on the far wall had stopped—at 17:45. It's battery-operated, could've stopped at random. Still, it felt strange that it froze at that exact moment. I wasn't mad at the clock. I was mad at time.

I didn't go on air. Just made sure the system was functioning. Checked the sound inputs. Some data looked like it was missing, then reappeared. Did it really fix itself, or did I imagine that?

I didn't talk to anyone today. Murat texted me—asked if I was dropping by for coffee. I didn't reply. Sometimes even the kindest questions feel like too much.

There are voices in my head. Not real ones, but familiar. Like someone's about to speak, but keeps inhaling instead. Like someone is there—but isn't.

Maybe tomorrow will be better. But today... even the studio turned its back on me.
