

[Recording begins – 00:00]

Onur (steady, low tone):
Some people act like they're not really in the room.
They're quiet. Avoid eye contact. Stay on the edges.
But there's one thing we forget...
Those on the edges are the ones who see everything.

[00:18]

Today I want to tell you about a man.
You don't know him.
But you've seen someone like him.
The kind who leans on a wall with his coffee, stays just outside the group, but hears every word.
His eyes are quiet, but sharp.

[00:36]

He had a habit.
He didn't raise his voice to silence people.
Just lifted his hand.
Palm open.
A silent "that's enough."
And somehow... it always was.
People stopped talking.
Some call that power.
I call it learned fear.

[00:58]

This man watched a woman.
Maybe they'd never spoken.
Maybe he just acted like they had.
But he watched her, carefully.
Same street. Same time. Same distance.
She changed her route.
Then changed it again.
But he never changed his.

[01:20]

And one day...
She heard a laugh behind her.
Short. Flat.
No joy in it – but just enough sound to land.
After that, she never wore headphones again.

[01:36]

Maybe she still walks like someone's behind her.
Because watching doesn't always need eyes.
Sometimes silence is a gaze.

[01:48]

There are no names in this story.
Because names don't matter.
Actions do.

And sometimes, years later, someone comes along who can read those actions.

He doesn't speak.

But he opens a file.

And he writes.

[Recording ends – 02:06]