

She didn't sit right away today.
Stood by the chair for a moment. Looked at me. Looked at the floor.
Then she asked, "Do you ever regret what you say?"

I told her, "Only when it's not heard the way I meant it."

She nodded like that meant something.

The truth is, I don't regret anything I said to her.
Because everything I said was measured, delivered, and watched.
Her reactions were always more valuable than her questions.

I'm not teaching her anything.
I'm studying her.
And she still thinks this is mutual.
