I've seen him before.

At first I thought he was new – just another quiet guy in a black coat, always hanging around the coffee area downstairs. But there was something about how he stands. Not aimless, not shy. Intent. Calculated.

I noticed it when he held the door for Beril last week. He didn't say a word. Didn't smile. Just stared at her as she passed, eyes locked forward like he was committing her silhouette to memory.

She didn't notice.
But I did.

Since then, I've caught him watching. Not just her – others too. But only when he thinks no one's looking. Always from corners. Always still. There's a rhythm to it. A pattern.

That's what made me open this file. Not because he did something yet.
But because he's waiting to.

Some people hide behind silence. Others use it as a weapon.
I don't know which one he is yet.
But I intend to find out.
